One spring morning, early in the month of March, 1747, eight years before the French and Indian war, two young men might have been seen standing at the gates of Old Belvoir the elegant home of the Hon. Wm. Fairfax on the Virginia shore of the Potomac river, two miles below Mount Vernon, which latter place was then the residence of Major Lawrence Washington, son of Augustine, and half brother of George Washington of ever honored memory, not yet sixteen years of age, though already nearly of manly stature and possessing much of manly bearing and dignity. The other was George. William Fairfax, son of the Belvoir proprietor, and older by eight years than his companion. The former after having completed his school education under the limited tuition of school masters, Hobby and Williams in the county of Westmoreland, Virginia, had come up from the lowlands a short time previously to make his home temporarily with his brother Lawrence until he could find some employment suited to the drift of his natural inclinations. It was here that the two Georges had first met and commenced an acquaintance which was very soon to ripen into confidential friendship, and ultimately, into a brotherly attachment and affection which no circumstances of their after lives were sufficient to mar or change. The inclinations of both these...
