So also with their baths. Cleanliness must have been held in high esteem by this stout soldier empire; for not only in Rome, where senators and patricians might lave their tender, well-fed bodies in perfumed water rippling in costly marble or bejewelled pools, but also at the furthestmost outposts of the empire, the public baths were as much a feature of their permanent settlement as were the fortifications of their camp. Thus, while we find crumbling Roman towers at Mayence and in Brittany, and Roman roads in Burgundy and the Black Forest, and Roman coins and silver plate in Hesse and even in Devonshire, we also find the well-preserved ruins...
